In the turn of the 20th Century, a genius son of a slave discovers the secret of time travel and designs a time machine that he cannot build. 125 years later, an African American college student in Chicago finds the plans for the time machine and travels to the year 1919 where he meets the inventor and his beautiful daughter.

But he has chosen an unfortunate time and gets caught up in the bloodiest race riot in Chicago's history.

"An inherently engaging and entertaining read from beginning to end, The Chronocar showcases author Steve Bellinger's genuine flair for originality and narrative driven storytelling." --Midwest Book Review

"...the most innovative take on time travel that I have ever read."
--The Black Science Fiction Society

Steve Bellinger was born and raised on the West Side of Chicago by a single mom who worked nights for a printing company. She would bring home books and magazines to encourage her kids to read. This is how Steve discovered Isaac Asimov, Robert Heinlein, Arthur C. Clarke and the other masters of classic science fiction. It didn't take long for him to get the itch to write. Over the years he has written everything from newspaper articles, comic strips and radio drama to short stories and fan fiction.

An original Trekkie, Steve and his wife Donna plan to renew their wedding vows with a full Star Trek-themed ceremony; he will wear an admiral's dress uniform, and she will be decked out in a custom-made leather-and-lace Klingon wedding dress.

Time travel is incredibly dangerous.

Building a time machine is surprisingly simple.

In 2015 Tony Carpenter stumbled upon the plans for the Chronocar, a time machine conceived before it could be built by Dr. Simmie Johnson, genius, scientist, and son of a slave. Tony's visit to 1919 to see the doctor and his lovely daughter Ollie turned into disaster, forcing the doctor to make a most difficult final decision.

Now the timeline has worked its way back to 2012. A new Tony Carpenter is about to be hit by a real blast from the past when he chances upon Dr. Johnson's granddaughter, who has a story he can hardly believe and evidence of a journey to the past he can't deny.

When Tony shows up in 1919 yet again, Dr. Johnson is confronted with the possibility of his invention ultimately obliterating all of creation. Can they locate and destroy all the copies of the journal with his article and any Chronocars that may exist before everything literally goes to hell?

Matty Williams' retirement as a computer tech goes awry when he and his girlfriend Divvie discover that new social technologies are subtly affecting the minds of their users. As they delve deeper into the technological marvels revolutionizing the lives of virtually everyone on the planet, they are set on a course that leads directly back to their employer, Roydon Technologies.

Now there's the latest gadget, augmented reality glasses known as "Augies," that can literally recreate reality for the user, all controlled by the ruthlessly efficient global computer system with the deceptively reassuring name of NANA.

Will Matty, Divvie, and their super geek friend, Howard, save humanity from a life of programmed subservience, or will their attempt to thwart NANA result in something even worse?

"The story built the level of intrigue and tension nicely, increasing its hold over the reader by fully immersing them in a future world. The technology introduced was believable and shocking, disturbingly charged with both wonder and terror...I would recommend this book to anyone."

A curse that dates back to the days of slavery has plagued Ron Lewis since childhood. Born in a black ghetto in Chicago in the 1960s, Ron's pragmatism is at odds with his experiences; whether, it's the trials of an interracial relationship or the supernatural forces that he can't seem to avoid. Just when he thinks he's finally found peace of mind, Ron's life is upended by tragedy. He gets the opportunity to use science to try to communicate with the dead, and to finally confront the evil that has plagued him and his family for generations.

That's when all hell breaks loose.
